Grammar Points

The focus of this lesson is a tricky verb form

佢哋搵過你笨？

Did someone cheat you?

In our vocabulary section, we taught you the word 搵笨, which is used to suggest that someone has been cheated or taken advantage of. A simple example of this is the sentence 我尋日俾人搵笨, which is in the passive voice and which we would consequently translate as "I was tricked yesterday."

But what happens if we want to switch this into the active voice, and have the verb take an object? This is what we see in the question 佢哋搵過你笨 ("did someone cheat you"). And our problem here is that this verb is originally a verb-adjective construction where the meaning is taken from the combination of the two. And in these cases even though we might consider this a standalone word, the rules for adding direct objects are somewhat complex.

Particularly, you have to split the verb from its complement and insert the new object right in the middle of the word. Consider the following examples:

1. 搵我笨
"Trick me."
2. 搵我老細笨
"Cheat my boss."
3. 唔好搵我笨
"Don't try to cheat me."

This can be a confusing to English speakers, if only because it isn't common in the English language to split up existing words into sub-units in order to change the meaning of those words. But this is very common in Cantonese when we are dealing with two character words which consist of a verb and then a complement of some sort which completes the meaning. So don't be tricked and keep your eyes open for this sort of thing!

Tips on Shopping in Hong Kong

Despite our dialogue, fraud in Hong Kong retail stores is virtually unheard of, or is almost always accidental. In our time in Hong Kong we've had many instances of being chased after by shopkeepers who gave us the incorrect change or accidentally short-changed us out of a few Hong Kong dollars. With that said, the prices in many Hong Kong retail stores are fairly high given the high rents. If you're on a budget, consider shopping more in Kowloon than on the island itself.
