The Focus of this Lesson is "The Mystery of the Missing Measure Words"

In our dialogue today, we see something interesting happen with measure words. Take a closer look at these two sentences in particular:

1. 個密碼係咩?
Go3 mat6 maa5 hai6 me1?
"What is your password?"
3. 你試下重新開個瀏覽器?
Nei5 si3 haa5 cung4 san1 hoi1 go3 lau4 laam5 hei3?
"Why don't you try restarting your browser?"

In previous lessons we've taught you that the normal pattern with measure words in Cantonese is to precede them with a number or a determiner specifying to how many or to which objects we are referring. This rule should lead us to create noun phrases like 一個音樂會 ("a concert") or 一部手提電腦 ("a laptop computer"), yet in our dialogue we see two instances in which the number is dropped, and yet there is no determiner like 這 used to provide the necessary contextual information. What is happening?

The answer to this mystery is that we can omit both numbers and determiners in front of measure words when it is obvious from context which particular object we are talking about. This is a very casual pattern, but also a very common one. So remember, when it is clear from context to which object you are referring, you can omit the number or determiner which is expected to precede the measure word.

1. 個瀏覽器需要重新打開
"This browser needs to be restarted."
2. 佢唔記得佐佢既密碼
"He doesn't remember his password."
